

Sexual Harassment in the Workplace

Building a culture of compliance to prevent discrimination

The Unseen Costs

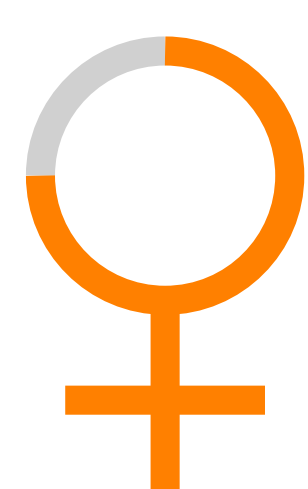

Sexual harassment in the workplace has a profound cost on the employer through the increased use of sick leave and job turnover of victims. It can also lead to a decline in productivity of up to 40%.

A study found that a single sexual harassment claim can dramatically reduce the public's perception of a company.

A Global Epidemic

It is estimated that 75% of the world's women aged 18+ have been sexually harassed.

Percentage of women who have experienced sexual harassment in the workplace

In 2017, 69% of Americans believed that the sexual harassment of women is a major problem, compared to 50% in 1998.

Power and Status

Perpetrators of sexual harassment are likely to be on the same level or senior to their victims.

Fear of Speaking Out

75% of people who are harassed at work never talk to a supervisor or union representative about it.

In 2017, 50% of victims in Canada felt that the incident was not serious enough to report, while 75% of victims experienced some kind of retaliation after reporting.

Education is Key

Men greatly underestimate the level of sexual harassment.

"If men think that the way to address workplace sexual harassment is to avoid one-on-one time with female colleagues, it will be a huge setback for women. Men who want to be on the right side of this issue shouldn't avoid women. They should mentor them."

Training is therefore essential in creating a culture of compliance and preventing discrimination.
